Wendell Berry's 1996 novel, A WORLD LOST, opens with Andy Catlett looking back at 1944: the summer he turned ten and the summer his uncle was murdered. As a narrator, Andy meanders in and out of memories about that season, his uncle, his father, the murder, and his childhood.

Berry's fifth novel and ninth work of fiction is set, like most of his spare, exact work, in the fictional town of Port William, Kentucky. Andy Catlett, the narrator, looks back from the present at the moment when his idyllic childhood came to an end, in the summer of 1944, when he was nine years old. His beloved Uncle Andrew, a man who savored ``company, talk, some kind of to-do, something to laugh at" above everything, is shot down, for unclear reasons, by the surly Carp Harmon.

A World Lost is the latest in Berry's fictional recreations of the lost world of Port William, Kentucky, in the 1940s, and it tells the story of Uncle Andrew Catlett, a womanizer and roisterer whose death in a trivial argument is retold by his grown nephew, Andy. Berry is uninterested in stylistic leaps or postmodern bravura: he is interested in a profound, well-told tale of honor and memory and community.
