Transactions travel through, and are made possible by, a highly evolved group of intermediaries. Those intermediaries sign up merchants to accept cards, handle card transactions, manage the dispute-resolution process, and, with regulatory agencies, set rules that govern card transactions. I examine the transaction process for debit cards with an eye toward demystifying this "Black Box"; I explain the two major parts of the transactions process - one, authorization, and two, clearing and settlement. I consider the complications introduced by general-purpose cards, such as Visa and MasterCard, emphasizing the key roles of merchant acquirers and card processors. I also discuss the risk of fraud in the transaction process. While the risk is low for face-to-face transactions, it is far higher for business done by mail, telephone, or over the Internet. Acquirers, who sign up merchants to accept cards and who provide or arrange for processing, bear most of the risk of loss if merchants fail to make good on transactions disputed by customers. To guard against such losses, acquirers evaluate the credit quality of merchants seeking or using the acquirers' services. I identify some of the risk factors associated with specific industries, merchant types, and transactions that influence the price merchants pay for acquirers' services. Finally, I discuss some ways that merchant acquirers and merchants manage risk, especially the risk of fraud.

Mediation and arbitration have been around as long as there have been conflicts between people. For centuries, parties in conflict have asked others to help them resolve a conflict that they cannot resolve themselves. Of course, these ADR (Alternative Dispute Resolution) processes have evolved over the years. But would you know what to do if you receive a notice to arbitrate a dispute? Did you know that if you have signed a contract with an arbitration clause that you can be forced to arbitrate a dispute? Do you know how to prepare for a mediation session or an arbitration
