The successor to the CL350, the Honda CL360 was built for three years and had a CB street-based twin. The main difference between the CB and the CL was of course, the scrambler pipes. Upgrades from the CL350 included a six speed transmission and an engine that was tuned for more torque over a broader rev band.

Honda already had similarly styled motorcycles on the market with 350-cc and 400-cc engines. Looking back, the introduction of a 360-cc model is somewhat confusing -- the CB360 engine was tuned for a slightly broader torque range, and some reviewers found its ride slightly more refined than those of the other CB models.
