The color of water varies with the ambient conditions in which that water is present. While relatively small quantities of water appear to be colorless, pure water has a slight blue color that becomes a deeper blue as the thickness of the observed sample increases. The blue hue of water is an intrinsic property and is caused by selective absorption and scattering of white light.

The Color of Water: Study Guide | SparkNotes

We usually think of water as a colourless liquid, but it's not true. When white light is shone through a long column of the stuff, the liquid is faintly blueish. That's because the water mops up the longer, redder wavelengths of light, leaving the bluer wavelengths unscathed. As with so many of its properties, however, water does this in a bizarre way, with the light energy being absorbed by its V-shaped H2O molecules, which start to vibrate as a result.
